The prosecution in this case barely scratched the surface of Microsoft's adverse impacts on every industry where it operates, and on the global economy. In technology markets, network effects overwhelm all other forces. As long as Microsoft remains intact, it controls every market it enters.

Had justice been served in this case, Microsoft would have been split into at least three separate companies which are not allowed to communicate with each other in private.

As it stands, they will continue to stifle innovation in computing and networking
